From the Executive Director's pen

Mental Flossing in time of COVID-19

Jack Llewellyn, Chamber Director

I still find it difficult to get my brain around what we're living through. Those who know me know I'm a pretty jovial, social guy, but I'm sorry folks, it's gotten to the point that Zoom meetings just don't cut it. The longer this goes on, the more subtly depressed we're all getting. We're social creatures, and isolation is not in our nature.

BUT we're here, and the best we can do at the moment is to keep our immune systems and our community strong and look to the future.

I say we all need to "mental floss" every day. Here's the visual for you... you open up the attic scrawl space, and there's nothing but a wall of cobwebs. Take the time to clear the cobwebs and mental floss!

Get up and get away from the computer. Go outside and stimulate your creative juices, and think about how to face the new business unusual. I've been gratified and amazed at how our local businesses have been inventive and said, "Ok, what do we do to pivot?" (New buzz word from my basketball days). A really good example is Honeyville converting their distillery to make Bear'y Clean hand sanitizer. I look forward to seeing a bottle of Honeyville's Bear'y Clean at every local business.

And speaking of local businesses...Order your favorite dish from your favorite restaurant, have a picnic and social distance in the great outdoors. You can find a list of restaurants at www.durangobusiness.org. Speaking of restaurants, I need to give a shout out to Dave Woodruff. Dave manages El Moro and is the local Restaurant Association representative. On top of all that, Dave sends out "the morning update" to our taskforce, consolidating all the days information so we can begin to tackle our next Covid project. Thank Dave when you see him.

And to add to the accolades, thanks to the more than 80 businesses that stopped by during our mask drive, we have distributed in excess of 300 masks, 300 buffs, 250 bandanas, and 100 hand sewn masks. During these difficult times there is always those who pay it forward. Bank of Colorado stepped up and sponsored the purchase of 150 touchless thermometers to be distributed throughout the community via our partners at the Business Improvement District and the Community Foundation. (If only a touchless thermometer could clear the mental cobwebs...)

Your Chamber staff continues to work to assist our businesses – albeit virtually. On June 3rd we'll be hosting a State of the Community (virtual) Eggs & Issues meeting 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. We look forward to bringing together key individuals to let everyone know how to keep on moving to a bright future. We continue to make all our educational meetings/seminars free of charge thanks to Bank of Colorado and Durango Area Association of Realtors.

So, how is the Chamber making any money in this time of COVID? I'll leave you with a little teaser, so you can start thinking (and mentally floss). Start taking photos of your favorite canine. Let your pooch take you for a walk and snap some candid shots while out and about. (Your pup needs the mental floss too).

So now, GO OUTSIDE in the sunshine. Breathe a lot of fresh air. Get some exercise. Do that "mental flossing" and take some time for yourself. Power up for the future.

Make an Impact in Virtual Meetings

A video conference isn't just a meeting over video — it's an entirely new experience and requires us to adapt our perspectives, habits, and tactics. Here are a few ways to adjust to this new norm. First, every presentation coach will tell you that direct eye contact helps to reinforce your point. In a video conference, this means looking at the camera, not your colleague's faces on the screen. Of course, it is challenging to focus on your camera for an entire meeting — especially while others are talking — but the more you practice, even for brief moments, the more comfortable you will become. Next, use a slightly louder-than-usual voice, because in addition to being audible, strong voices convey authority, credibility, and confidence. Be mindful of your background as well. Cluttered rooms make you seem disorganized, so find a spot where the background is simple and professional. And pay attention. Your professional reputation can suffer if it looks like you're distracted. Close your email, turn off notifications on your phone ... and do not forget that you are on camera.

TIPS, TOOLS & STATS

Organizing Your Home and Business

By Karla Rooney, The Organized Interior

In this time of uncertainty and change in the world, being able to adapt to a new business climate is key. Now more than ever people are working from home, so being organized is crucial. Both small and large businesses are learning new ways of working to create social distancing in order to comply with state regulations and keep our vulnerable populations safe and healthy. Home offices are being carved out of unused spaces in homes in unprecedented numbers. In this new landscape, creativity and organizational skills are being called upon to keep businesses running efficiently, productively, and successfully, often while working out of a home office.

Balancing a business and working from home can be challenging. Being organized brings many benefits both in the workplace and at home. Organized spaces create a sense of peace in your life while allowing you to be efficient and effective. A lack of visual clutter aids focus on the task at hand and minimizes distractions. When important items are easy to find punctuality is enhanced, deadlines are not missed, time is saved and productivity increases. All these benefits lead to less stress, more financial success, and more time to do the things you love.

The first step in getting organized in your home and office is to evaluate your spaces and define your goals. Is your home office arranged in such a way that you can work efficiently in your space? Can you easily find what you need? Is it a space that inspires you? Are you desiring to find a place for everything or are you longing to simplify and downsize your stuff? Is your home a place of refuge and peace or is the clutter overwhelming to you? These simple questions can help you determine your goals.

After settling on goals for your space, begin the process of creating order. In the office, clear off the desk, file stray paperwork and label everything. You may need to create filing systems and storage if your current system is overwhelmed. Unused vertical space can be a great way to create more storage. In your home, start with a room or a category and methodically work to clear out duplicate items and find a place for items you want to keep. A professional organizer can be a great resource for ideas and inspiration and even hands on help if needed.

Last but not least, follow every professional organizer's advice of creating habits that maintain your newly organized spaces. Develop a routine of putting things away in their place every time. Address paperwork such as mail and invoices daily and don't let it pile up. Organizing items and batching tasks can also be a way to save time and increase efficiency. Find a method that works for you and consistently follow it.

Becoming organized takes some time and effort, but the benefits to your business and home are endless. Be inspired, stay safe, and be healthy.

Who Has the Coolest Dog in Durango?

The often-debated question “who has the coolest dog in Durango” will soon be answered with some clarity. If there are two things Durangotangs love... it's their dogs and their beer! The Coolest Dog in Durango contest will definitely combine those two loves!

The Durango Chamber of Commerce along with our “Top Dog” Sponsor Alpine Bank will launch the “Coolest Dog in Durango” contest beginning Monday, June 22nd. Steamworks Brewing Co. and Four Corners Broadcasting have also partnered in the contest as our “Sit, Stay, Heel” sponsors along with our “Fetch” sponsor; Durango Herald and our “Paws Up” sponsors; Allison Ragsdale Photography, Pet Haus and Marketing Concepts Squared. The big winner is our non-profit beneficiary The La Plata County Humane Society.

While we can't share ALL the details just yet – just know that you'll need a cool photo of your pooch to enter the contest and you'll need the help of your family and friends to help secure the “win.”

What will you win you ask? Well, we cannot divulge all the details yet, but it is BIG...REALLY BIG, and it has to do with BEER plus more, more, more!

Watch for details on how you can enter coming very soon!!!

NEWS & EVENTS

Are Nonstop Zoom Meeting Exhausting Your Team? Use this Quick Assessment to Fix Your Video Conferences.

Last year, a Leadership IQ study found that remote employees are 87% more likely to love their jobs than people that work in offices. And one of the big reasons why is that normally-remote employees can spend more concentrated time on deep work, and they are able to focus without interruptions (for example, nonstop meetings). And uninterrupted productivity feels great.

Pre-pandemic, most bosses that were comfortable having remote employees in the first place were comfortable leaving them alone to crank out their work. But with pandemic-induced remote working, we have got millions of managers and employees inexperienced in working remotely. That means they are less comfortable leaving people alone to crank out their work, and that in turn has led to a staggering increase in videoconference meetings. And nonstop videoconference meetings are exhausting.

The good news is that while most people are getting mentally-fried with the preponderance of videoconference meetings, a quick end-of-meeting assessment can dramatically improve (and typically shorten) the experience.

A word of warning, however: I am going to show you a quick assessment to give your team at the end of every videoconference meeting. If leaders listen to, and act on, the feedback, subsequent videoconference meetings will be great. But if employees' feedback is ignored, not only will meetings not improve, people will be angry. Remember that every question you ask implies a promise you are going to do something with the answer.

At the end of your next videoconference meeting, reserve four minutes at the end to conduct this four-question assessment. Display each question one at a time, and then give one minute to answer each one. (The first time you do this, you might need to give two-three minutes per question for people to respond). And you can ask everyone to simply type their response into the chat or question box (depending on which platform you are using).

Here are the four questions:

1. How well did we meet our Statement of Achievement?
2. One thing you would like to see more of:
3. One thing you would like to see less of:
4. What is your personal takeaway (action item) from this meeting?

Let us explore each question and why we ask it.

Question #1: How well did we meet our Statement of Achievement?

Sadly, most meetings (whether virtual or face-to-face) fail to produce an identifiable achievement. More than 20,000 people have taken the online quiz "How Do Your Time Management Skills Stack Up?" And we know that a significant majority say that they're "frequently stuck in meetings that are not productive or an efficient use of everyone's time."

A big reason why so many meetings feel inefficient is that those meetings lack a clear objective. That is why we need to use a Statement of Achievement. A Statement of Achievement is literally one sentence that says, "As a result of this meeting, we will have achieved _____."

That blank can be anything; it's your meeting. But before you can go ahead and proceed with that meeting, you must be able to fill in that blank and then share that Statement of Achievement with the people who will be in that meeting. While ideally this would be done well ahead of time, you can get away with starting your videoconference meeting by telling your team "gang, as a result of this videoconference, we will have achieved _____. And once we achieve that, this videoconference is complete."

Here are the two most significant benefits of doing this. First, when you force yourself to announce a Statement of Achievement, meetings end, on average, 17 minutes sooner. Second, if you cannot come up with a viable purpose for your meeting, and compose a Statement of Achievement that sounds worthwhile, there is no point in having that meeting. And if you want to quickly reduce Zoom burnout, just eliminate any meeting that does not have a crystal-clear purpose and goal.

Question #2: One thing you would like to see more of ...

Even in meetings that seem interminable, there is often some part of the call that provided at least a bit of value. And leaders need to know what that piece was.

But asking your team what they would like to see more of is quite different than asking them to describe their favorite part of the meeting. Their favorite part may have been a one-time random occurrence and thus not a repeatable feature.

Maybe my favorite part of the meeting was when Bob's cat stuck her face in his coffee cup. It was funny, sure, but it is not repeatable, nor is it helpful to me as the team leader.

Question #3: One thing you would like to see less of Another rapid way to reduce virtual meeting burnout is to identify the least useful pieces of our videoconferences and stop doing them. Maybe attendees are late or haven't plugged in their headset beforehand. Maybe we spend too much time doing project updates. Maybe we do too much rotating of screen sharing. As a leader, I want to know what's not working in our videoconferences, because there will undoubtedly be at least a few of those things that I can quickly fix or eliminate.

Question #4: What's your takeaway (action item) from this meeting

There are always going to be a few touch-base meetings that don't have any assignments or action items at the conclusion. But when you see that employees don't have any identifiable action items emerging from lots of your meetings, this should prompt serious rethinking about whether those meetings are necessary.

And if you want to reduce videoconference burnout quickly, eliminate the meetings that consistently lack action items (unless their core purpose is explicitly non-task-related).

You don't have to use this end of meeting assessment indefinitely. But at least for the next one-two months, while we are experiencing peak Zoom burnout, this quick four-minute exercise should become a standard part of your meeting wind-down. And then, when you've made significant progress in eliminating burnout, move to a bi-weekly or monthly cadence.

RIBBON CUTTING

Four Corners Clean

The Durango Diplomats hosted their first Virtual Ribbon Cutting on Tuesday, May 12th for Four Corners Clean. Owners Nick Johnson, Matt Cranston and Josh Robinson have only been in business a few months but have already made an impact by creating a safer community through cleaning at a micro-level. According to Johnson, Cranston, and Robinson, using electric atomizers, they blanket your home or business with a safe and effective EPA-registered disinfectant that has been used extensively in healthcare & food production facilities for decades. This unique process decreases the chances of transmission and spread of viruses and bacteria in your home or business, but also helps the community by eliminating areas for further contamination. If you would like to learn more about the services offered you can visit www.fourcornersclean.com or give them a call at 970-880-0206 or email: contact@fourcornersclean.com.

Mary Michalak Farmers Insurance

The Durango Diplomats joined Mary Michalak Farmers Insurance Agency for a Virtual Ribbon Cutting on Thursday, May 28th. Conveniently located at 2223 Main Avenue, Suite 101, Mary and her two employees are ready to help you with your insurance needs. They carry all lines of insurance including home, auto, life, business, and specialty. Mary and her staff take pride in providing exceptional customer service along with educating their customers so that their families and businesses are properly protected. If you would like to find out more about the products and services offered by Mary Michalak Farmers Insurance you can visit www.farmersagent.com/mmichalak or call 970-247-4302 or email mmichalak@farmersagent.com.

BUSINESS CONNECTION

Just Click Printing - Jay Willmon

written by Sara Lynn (Kuntz) Valentine

“My dad started Just Click Printing 36 years ago in Farmington,” Jay says. “We have a Farmington location, another in Durango, and a third in Pagosa. We do a lot of printing & copy work, including offset and digital printing, blueprints, brochures, magazines, postcards ...and sewing that includes embroidery on shirts, caps, jackets, towels, blankets, and tee shirts for events like concerts, races (on foot or bike), graduations, and family reunions.”

Jay grew up in Aztec and spent time all over the Four Corners, including Durango. He went out of state to both college and graduate school, before returning in 1998 to help his dad at the family business. Jay started out by making sales calls in Durango, Bayfield, and Pagosa. In the middle of all those sales calls Jay met his wife, Annie, who was at that time a Fort Lewis Leadership Coordinator. Jay and Annie now live in Farmington with their two children.

“We have 52 machines, including offset presses, folding machines, binding equipment, perforating, tabbing, and stapling,” Jay says, “with most of the biggest ones in Farmington. They include three offset presses, two digital presses, five copiers, two screen presses, thirteen embroidery machines, two folding machines, binding equipment, perforating, tabbing, stapling, etc... We send out a lot of mail.”

The Covid 19 economic shutdown hit Just Click Printing right along with most businesses in Farmington, Durango and Pagosa. Events large and small, present and future, were cancelled and the print marketing that businesses routinely do was put on hold.

Jay is not one to sit around and wait for business to get back to ‘normal’.

“We’ve been making masks for six or seven weeks now,” he says. “We were all sitting around wanting to stay busy. I said to our embroidery person, ‘Half of the people shopping at Walmart today had masks on.’”

They spent a day and half making prototypes and finally found one they liked. They cut out and sewed about a dozen before Jay put a picture on the Just Click Printing Facebook page. He then shared it to his personal Facebook page. After they sold the first one hundred or so, Jay told his wife, “I think we’re out of friends and relatives.” That night on the news there were several reports about the shortage of masks. Jay googled socialmasks.com and discovered that no one owned that domain. He bought it and sat down to create a website. His dad and his wife thought he was crazy. “It’s been nonstop ever since,” Jay says.

The Farmington newspaper ran an article on Just Click Printing’s new mask production business. A thousand orders came in that day and again the next. “The first day our website was up and running, we got an order every five minutes, which equaled 3,000 that day. I couldn’t make them that fast! It took us a week and a half to process how to make it all work, and the orders just kept coming in.

“We’ve hired six new people to sew the masks and we bought six more sewing machines. We’re making the masks on the embroidery machines, which are normally used to decorate something that already exists - like a cap or a shirt. What we’re doing now has required repurposing those machines ...in other words, using the machines for what they CAN do, not necessarily what they are designed to do.”

The demand has been great and Jay and his team are making masks as fast as they can. Just Click Printing does sell to individuals, but the big orders come from businesses in Durango, Farmington, Pagosa and beyond (Los Alamos National Labs, for instance). A lot of business owners want their business logos to appear on the masks their employees wear. After a mask order is completed Jay’s team shrink wraps them and mails them all over the country, which means Just Click Printing’s well oiled mailing machines are getting plenty of use these days as well. Masks are washable and reusable. 7000 stitches per mask make them very durable. They sell for $10 to $11 each, plus around a dollar in postage. Masks with logos are priced at $15.

Just Click Printing has been a Durango Chamber member for twenty years or more. “The Chamber is a great way to meet people!” Jay says. Jay’s dad, Fred, still runs the Durango shop half the time and the Pagosa shop half the time. Jay’s mom, Sarah, still keeps the books.

You can reach Jay by email at orders@justclickprinting.com or durango@justclickprinting.com or by phone at 505-326-1344. Learn more at www.justclickprinting.com or www.socialmasks.com. You may also want to visit the socialmasks page on Facebook.

What Kind of Leader are You During Stressful Times?

Written by: Stacy Reuille-Dupont

As spring turns to summer the sense of new beginnings and growth are all around us. In the leafing trees, the blooming flowers, and the assessment of our old patterns as the continued uncertainty swirls around us. During times like these it is important to recognize how to manage stress.

Stress is not all bad. In fact not having any is also detrimental to us. If I do not stress my bones they do not become as strong. If I do not challenge myself to learn something new I do not grow. I become stagnant and despairing. We need some stress in our lives. Good leaders know how to engage with healthy stress and react to negative stress in positive ways.

Research shows that leaders who can manage stress with compassion but decisiveness are the most successful. Leaders with the skills to be connected to the personal while also making tough decisions with thoughtfulness are the ones whose teams follow them anywhere. These leaders lead from a place of authenticity which requires they be vulnerable to their own fears, stressors, and desires.

Research also shows us that many leaders lose endurance for being present to the needs of their team when they are stressed. They use authoritarian behaviors to control the staff in efforts to stay in charge and show no vulnerability. They believe showing any vulnerability means they are weak. Maybe they assume if the team feels a sense of vulnerability they will not follow. This is not the case. Vulnerability is actually a source of strength that helps teams become more resilient.

Yes, there are boundaries when you are the leader. Not only do you need to be skillful authentically seeing the strengths and weaknesses of your team, you also need to be skillful at making decisions. Sometimes swift and tough decisions. When you can balance out the personal and business aspects of your job, you become a stronger leader. You build more trust. The staff know you have their back. They know you see their value and that you appreciate them - because you have worked hard to let them know you value their strengths. You have worked hard to be real about their weaknesses without shaming them. You support them and help them grow outside their comfort zone. They also know you have an eye on the larger picture and are motivated by the best interests for all parties. Sometimes this is not in their personal best interest, but a good leader is fair. A good leader is balanced in decision making and can communicate this balance effectively. A good leader is consistent in showing up to support team members to the best of their ability. People respect fair, balanced, and consistency even when they don't agree with the final decision.

Today take note of your ability to show up authentically with compassion and strength. Can you show up with vulnerability and still show strength? Can you meet the stressors of your work environment without bullying, belittling, or creating fear in those around you? Can you show up fairly, with balance, consistently and with respect? Want to learn more leadership skills. Take your ability to manage a team to a higher level? Learn how to navigate stress and uncertainty with greater ease and clarity? Then check out Leadership La Plata. Not only will this program challenge you in fair, balanced, and compassionate ways for your strengths and weaknesses without fear based shaming, it will help you learn how to be stronger by embracing your own vulnerability. This is what creates a good leader.
